A regulation of this kind prevails altendy in the City of London, where meat that has been condemned is often sold as manure at 6lbs, for a penny after being subjected to a process which prevents al. possibility of a dishoncet purchaser loisting it on poor people as an article of food. That most bought at naval stores has been largely resold under conditions to which at least suspicion attaches, we may conclude from the fact that Lord George Hamilton has found it necessary to make a rule similar to the one enforced by the Corporation of London. It is not, perhaps, amprising that people should buy the pestilent stuff, but that they should be able to find a market for it among ships of the merchant service to anything like the extent implied by Mr Plimsell's statement is extremely doubtful. If it is true, even to any degree, the matter certainly demands searching inquiry.
